1926 was an eventful year for Hubert Malfait. He participated in the group exhibition at the Stedelijk Museum in Amsterdam and the Venice International Biennale. In the summer of 1926, he exhibited in the group exhibition at the Galerie à la Vièrge in Brussels and in the autumn he was represented at Galerie L'Oeuvre in Antwerp. From October 1926, Malfait started working under a contract at Galerie Sélection. He was supported by André De Ridder and Georges Marlier.

During this period, Malfait painted with creamy layers of paint and with coarse and broad brushstrokes. His human figures are monumental. They completely fill the foreground of his works, as in this painting 'Woman with coffee grinder'.

The painting 'Woman with coffee grinder' depicts the everyday reality of his immediate village surroundings. Characteristic of his expressionist period (1923-1931) this period is the importance the artist attaches to the human figure: Woman with coffee grinder. This figure composition was devised and leans towards the classical figures of his artist friend Gust. De Smet. The woman figure stands out for its sense of construction, firmness, concentration and simplicity. The large, closed surfaces Malfait undoubtedly saw in the work of André Lhote. Malfait creates an alienating and intricate structure in unusual areas of colour. The sculptural character of the figure in Woman with coffee grinder has disappeared. Fine colour tonalities and thinner paint typify the quality of this expressionist work. The forms are closed, the outlines of the surfaces are finer, less accentuated. The fluidity of the line and the drawn-out figure are a silent hint to Modigliani's portraits.
